Together with your mom and your 2 siblings you live in a small appartement.

Most of your free-time you spend hanging out with your friends from the neighbourhood. Recently, you have been diagnosed with diabetes Type 2, apparently because of your unhealthy lifestyle. Money is somewhat scarce at home, which is why you mainly buy convenient food. You feel ashamed of this and try to cover your insecurity.

Badmouth

You think the newest technology is extremely interesting, especially for someone with a chronic disease like you. Unfortunately, you won't be able to afford it. Instead, you try to point at all the disadvantages the technology has to make it seem like you don't care that you're not having it.

Unemployed

You have just finished your study and are currently looking for a job. However, this is not so easy without The Lifetimer which you couldn't afford yet.

Additionally, living with diabetes has become a struggle. You heard several voices saying that these kind of diseases are self-imposed, making you feel responsible for your own situation. Since a few months, you have started to work out regularly.

Frustrated

While working hard on changing your lifestyle and increasing your health, without The Lifetimer the effect is barely measurable. This is frustrating!

Additionally, by not using the technology you get lower insurance coverage and less efficient treatments, you still have difficulty finding a job, and you're afraid that you need to vacate your appartement. You feel guilty and exhausted. This is not fair!
